Longevity and aging - PubMed Central (PMC)

The first molecular theory of human aging to gain prominence was the free radical theory of aging, proposed by Denham Harman more than 50 years ago . This theory posited that oxidative damage from free radicals, produced as a by-product of metabolism and environmental insults, results in damage that, over time, ultimately causes the pathological consequences of aging at the cellular, tissue Biological causes of aging and lifespan limitation - Work ...

Longevity - Wikipedia

The U.S. Census Bureau view on the future of longevity is that life expectancy in the United States will be in the mid-80s by 2050 (up from 77.85 in 2006) and will top out eventually in the low 90s, barring major scientific advances that can change the rate of human aging itself, as opposed to merely treating the effects of aging as is done today. The Census Bureau also predicted that the

Medicine, ageing and human longevity - PubMed Central (PMC)

According to one understanding of human ageing, there is, as a result of evolution, a limit to the extent to which it is possible to prolong human life. Demographers such as Bruce Carnes and Jay Olshansky (Olshansky et al, 2001 ; Carnes et al, 2003) suggest that we are already nearing the maximum human lifespan.

FOXO Genes and Human Longevity Fight Aging!

In addition, the human FOXO sequence variations and their effect on the resulting proteins should be studied, the possible findings can also reveal the underlying mechanisms of FOXO-induced healthy aging. The delay in age-related pathologies including cancer and neurodegenerative diseases and living long life depends on the control of morbidity. It is therefore an exciting area of study to
