Joseph Duke Filonowicz takes the reader on an engaging, informative tour of some of the main issues in philosophical ethics, explaining and defending the ideas of the early-modern British sentimentalists. These philosophers - Shaftesbury, Hutcheson, Hume, and Smith argued that it is our feelings, and not our 'reason', which ultimately determine how we judge what is good or bad, right or wrong, and how we choose to act towards our fellow human beings. Filonowicz draws on contemporary Fellow-Feeling and the Moral LifeBy Joseph Duke Filonowicz ...

The best argument Filonowicz can detect for the existence of a distinct moral sense in Hutcheson is simply that, as we experience a special kind of moral approval, it must be underpinned by a dedicated faculty that is the basis of its exercise. It is, however, difficult to interpret this as anything other than the labelling of a mystery rather than a solution to it, as Filonowicz frankly
