Ephraim Radner's commentary on Leviticus certainly fulfills the promise of the Brazos Theological series. The first section, on Leviticus 1-3, the Burnt offering, the Grain offering, and the Peace Offering, literally astounded me with the Christological connections that Radner makes. The physical body of Christ is the "figure" that dominates and enlivens the entire book. I eagerly look forward to finishing the commentary, it reads so well (and more easily than some of his books), and to more

The [Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible] offers a scholarly defense for figural reading of the Bible. This series provides permission to combine the findings of biblical criticism with the theological riches of the Spirit-led church while maintaining intellectual integrity. One hopes the series will enrich and expand this synergy. One also hopes for more volumes like Radner's, which Overview. In this commentary, Radner offers an interesting perspective on Leviticus. Though on the surface Leviticus is a book of laws concerning sacrifices, worship, the priesthood, and many other subjects, at the heart of the book is the underlying message that God is holy and requires his children to be holy.

"Leviticus in the Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible series stands out, from within that series, for its sheer depth and intensity. . . . The way Radner's commentary is written invites readers to enter into a kind of dialogical relationship with his commentary and the biblical text of Leviticus, which I understand to be one of the proper ends of a theological commentary. . . .
